A stranger taught me a valuable lesson in stewardship

My son and I shared a car this summer. There were two rules. Don't let the gas get low and replace the money in the console if you use it.

I was driving to Home Depot on a ridiculously hot day when I saw a woman standing in the median with a sign asking for help. The light was red so I rummaged in the console and found four dollars. The left turn arrow changed to green so I quickly said "take care, I hope this helps" as I handed her the money and started to inch forward. In a panicked voice I heard her call out, "wait, wait please wait" so of course I waited.

This wonderful woman handed me a gift that I now cherish.

There are so many things I love about this gift. She took the time to personalize it with the handwritten explanation of how the money would be used. She used a universal visual symbol of love.

And she made sure every donor received a gift, even the lady in a rush to get to Home Depot.
